Brilliantly colored parrotfish dominate a stall in the Makishi public market in the Okinawan town of Naha. Meticulously clean, Japanese markets are a testament to the affluence of this island nation. Some scientists attribute this longevity to the island's unique, unbeatable combination of healthy eating habits, exercise, and low stress, as well as a community commitment to ensuring the quality of its older citizens' lives. Sadly, although the island is being studied for clues to the oldest generation of Okinawan's great longevity, studies say that the younger population will not live as long because of their diets higher in saturated fats and calories.
