MODULE ABSTRACT:

The module explores the main theoretical and historiographical debates on nationalism and national identities. The course covers the classical disputes on the nature of nationalism, the different schools dealing with the origins of nations, together with new interpretations on the transmissions of national identities. The latter includes nationalism from below, the local turn and the geographical dimensions of nation-building. The module also explores the relationship between nation, gender and class and delves into current debates on nationalism, postcolonialism and globalization.

OBJECTIVES:

1. Providing students with an advanced knowledge of theoretical approaches to the study of national identities and nationalism.
2. Providing students with the conceptual tools to explore the phenomena of national identities and nationalism.
3. Providing students with the analytical tools for investigating current issues related to nationalism.

ECTS Credits: 6TEACHING: Semester 1REQUIREMENTS: No specific requirements.MODULE CONTENTS

1. What is nationalism? Early debates and theories.
2. When was the nation? Primordialism, perennialism, ethno-symbolism and modernism.
3. Nation-building and the nationalization of the masses.
4. Nationhood from below.
5. Banal and everyday nationalism.
6. The spatial turn and the three spheres of nationalization.
7. Gender and nation.
8. Narration and imagology.
9. Current debates: Nationalism in the global era.

TEACHING ACTIVITIES

The module will combine synchronic and diachronic activities. The synchronic activities will include mini-lectures, seminars, student presentations and debates. Diachronic tasks will include reading secondary and primary sources, taking part in the student fora, writing essays, book reviews and reports, together with some other online academic tasks.

Contact hours: 3 hours per week, including synchronic and diachronic activities.

ASSESSMENTS

Seminar presentations: 20%

Fora participation: 20%

Final assessment: 60%

The final assessment consists of two assignments:

- Book review. An 800-word review of a book of your choice. 20%. To be submitted on 31 October 2023.
